Hi Ross

In February you people installed termidetector monitoring devices into our 54 unit townhouse complex. I personally carried out 3 monthly inspections on the devices myself on each of the units. I discovered a partly eaten Termidetector dowel in one of the units and called in our pest controller from Kingscliff who also does yearly termite and general insect inspections in our complex. Although nothing was visible he also found extensive damage done to the architraves, skirting and frame work to the unit. He used an interesting fibre optic camera which he poked through the termidetector holes in the walls to check out the damage and to see if the termites had ventured any further into the unit. The last inspection the pestie did was 2 months before I discovered them and no problems were reported which means the termites were either, not there or he failed to detect them during his inspection.

My inspection and early discovery using termidetectors may have been instrumental in saving not only the unit where they were found but also extensive damage to adjoining units in the complex as the next scheduled pest inspection by the pestie was 10 months later.

Good luck with everything.
